

“The pursuit of the truth will set you free ... even if you never catch up to it.”

Ordinarily this space is reserved for thoughts on running and being ... But lately we have encountered a culture of distractions and contradictions. The most recent one concerns a man named Che Guevara.

For some reason the Hollywood crowd and its messengers have decided to glamourize and romanticize this man with posters, t-shirts, and Che's revolutionary garb. This man was a murderer. He was Fidel Castor's executioner and killed hundreds of people who disagreed with Castro's revolution.

Yet 50 years later Che is portrayed as a hero. The pop culture has bestowed hero status on the murderer. How desperate are we for heroes? What does it say about our current culture? What does the future hold?
